

Market Talk By Megan Lee & Ritzy Ryciak

April means daylight saving time. What is your best 'turn back the clock' story?

Rodrick Coplin
Taxi Driver

"This woman came frantically running out of an apartment, maniacally waving her arms and saying she needed to get to the Argosy boat by 8:35, or she would be fired. I told her it was only 7:30 and could physically see her stress dissipate. We ended up dating for a year . . . I was her hero."

David Schiabile
Il Gringo Imports

"Last year, two or three weeks after the time change, an agent of mine came in using it as an excuse for being late. I fired her – but, she's back now."

Matt Ottenbach
Inn at the Market

"I showed up an hour early for work once, [not here] and they didn't tell me . . . then, like two hours later they're like 'why did you come in early?'"

Bridget

"In high school I used to try to extend my curfew, slinking home an hour late and saying 'ohhhh, I must've looked at the wrong clock'....it never really worked, but I tried it every year....hehehe."

Sergio
Trudy & Lenora's
(a.k.a. Sergio's Barber Shop)

"I am so drowsy from allergies, it seems any change is OK. I am like a zombie . . . but still do good hair." [wink]

And speaking of books ...

In July 1922 the Seattle Public Library opened a Pike Place Market branch. The underground space, in what is now the Market's Down Under, occupied a former grocery, next to a donut shop and above a lard rendering plant.

Despite the outdoor noises and smells the tiny, 1,000-book sanctuary issued 350 cards in the first two months – and Seattle was much smaller then.

The library appreciated the many different languages spoken in the Market and catered to non-English speakers as well as a variety of other interests.

For more information check out Alice Shorett and Murray Morgan's book "The Pike Place Market: People, Politics and Produce." An updated version is expected around 2007. (Or ask David Ghoddousi at Lionheart for a good book about Market history.)

"No comment."
